Ash Wednesday Poem

I love the contrast between the first two and the last two verses of this poem.

The author like myself is clearly not a fan of the baroque church style, an allegory for the way we "parody the divine." No doubt there are other styles that do the same.

Ash Wednesday Poem

These frowning aisles as penitentially

As though it walked in sackcloth. Let it be

Laid at the feet of all that ever grew

Twisted and false, like this rococo shrine

Where cupids smirk from candy clouds and where

The Lord, with polished nails and perfumed hair,

Performs a parody of the divine.

The candles hiss; the organ-pedals storm;

Writhing and dark, the columns leave the earth

To find a lonelier and darker height.

The church grows dingy while the human swarm

Struggles against the impenitent body's mirth.

Ashes to ashes. . . . Go. . . . Shut out the light.

And so the light runs laughing from the town,
Pulling the sun with him along the roads
That shed their muddy rivers as he goads
Each blade of grass the ice had flattened down.
At every empty bush he stops to fling
Handfuls of birds with green and yellow throats;
While even the hens, uncertain of their notes,
Stir rusty vowels in attempts to sing.

And throws an olive blush on naked hills

That hoped, somehow, to keep themselves in white.

A carnival of colour, gladly spills

His blood: the resurrection—and the light.

Louis Untermeyer